Update: Fed Rate Hike Checklist

Economics

Americas

Unemployment ups the odds of a September move

At Chair Yellen's testimony in July, she noted that: "If the economy evolves as we expect, economic conditions would likely make it appropriate at some point this year to raise the federal funds rate target, thereby beginning to normalize the stance of monetary policy." Domestic momentum seems strong enough to support the beginnings of policy normalization with a rate hike in September. The FOMC's central tendency projections for domestic activity are generally being met or beat (see table, next page). Indeed, the unemployment rate has now reached the Fed's "longer-run" estimate, thought to be a proxy for the natural rate. The Fed's projections were made at the same time as projections regarding rate hikes that implied between one and two hikes in 2015.

September has three advantages. 1) It offers a compromise between hawks and doves, getting one rate hike "out of the way" without committing the Fed to more. 2) It provides optionality for those who anticipate that more than one hike this year would likely be appropriate (10 FOMC members, or the majority of the committee, as of June. Though likely there are now a few less). 3) It avoids any risks resulting from policy changes around year-end, when bank funding issues tend to become more complex.

Foreign strains and their spillover into financial markets are likely to continue to weigh on participants. However, financial conditions have become easier over the last few days. What will matter to the Fed will be financial conditions the week of the meeting.

We continue to believe that, once the Fed moves, economic conditions could improve, prompting further moves by the Fed. At the same time, we believe that the fact that both unemployment and inflation tend to lag economic activity and to move in trend-like fashion helps to explain why past Fed rate hike cycles have evolved as they have in the past.

What will it take for the Fed to move?

The improvement in the unemployment rate now has the Fed not only below their year-end forecast but also hitting their longer-run estimate. At the same time, financial conditions have improved since August 27 (our last checklist).

Now	27-Aug
 Unemployment rate: 5.1%
 Central tendency year-end forecast: 5.25%; Range: 5.2-5.3%
Status: The unemployment rate has now reached the "longer-run" forecast from the Federal Reserve and is below their forecast for year-end. (Hence two checks.)
 Payroll gains: 221,000 3-month average (Aug)
Bar for tightening: average of about 200,000
Status: The 3-month average is just below the 12-month average of 243,000.
 Core inflation: 1.2% (Jul)
Central tendency year-end forecast: 1.35%; Range: 1.3-1.4%. Target: 2.0%
Status: Inflation is running slightly below target but at the year-end central tendency range.
The jump in average hourly earnings may alleviate some concern as could the September 16th CPI release.
 Gross domestic product: 2.7% (y/y through Q2)
Central tendency year-end forecast: 1.9%; Range: 1.8-2.0%
Status: Growth in the first half of 2015 is running at a 2.7% pace. To achieve the Fed's forecast would only require growth in the second half of 1.7% q/q annualized. It seems highly unlikely that growth will not exceed the tepid growth rate projected by the Fed.
 Financial conditions: -0.36 (previous 5-days)
Status: Before the start of rate hike cycles in 1994, 1999 and 2004 financial conditions* were in positive territory. There has been improvement recently (Hence the smaller "x" ). Nevertheless, the current level of financial conditions still appears inconsistent with a rate hike. However, there are still two weeks before the FOMC decision. What will matter more to the FOMC are financial conditions between September 11 and 17th.
*Financial conditions as measured by the Bloomberg Financial Conditions Index (BFCIUS)

Figure 1: As of June, 15 of 17 Fed officials wanted a rate hike given their outlook for growth, inflation and unemployment. 10 of 17 members wanted more than one rate hike suggesting a bias toward a September move.

Figure 2: Financial conditions* have rebounded over the past few days. In past cycles, the Fed has begun rate hikes when conditions are above zero. They tapered with a level of 0.775.

*Includes money market, bond and equity market conditions including spreads and volatility. A positive value shows accommodative positions.
